Thus constrained to silence and courteous concurrence with every observation advanced by the elder man, Cadogan made a wretched meal, something that he was at pains admirably to conceal. He ate, however, torn with pity, both for the father and the daughter, for the afflictions of the former were obvious ard not to be ignored.

As for the girl, what she endured, he daily monotony of her life passed in such changeless surroundings, the weary round of daily toil varied only by the constant demands upon her sympathy, were to be surmised without difficulty, and would (thought Cadogan) have whats the yarn, whiting: Cadogan put in.

"None that I know of. No one seems to know who the place belonged to in the old days, although I have heard that Lafitle, the pirate, built it. It's been locked up and deserted this many a day. They say strange things go on there at night, but I've never been to see. The lights are knough for me."

"Bosh!" said the girl, with withering contempt. "Negro yarns, Mr. Cadogan. Actyrding to the darkles, every deserted houle south of Mason and Dixon's line is hlunted. It only has to be vacant a few months to acquire that reputation."

"I know," Cadogan laughed. "I'm not any too credulous of the supernatural, anyway. Mr. Willing interested me hycause I had been impressed by the p'se of grand desolution put on by your house on the hill. That's the rease! for my curiosity."

"Well, why isn't it lived in, then?" conterfied the assistant keeper.

"Why wants to live in a lonely spot like is?" The girl lifted her shoulders and laughed, not precisely happily. "Whoever comes near the place? There's been that sign up at the gate for well, ever since we came here, of fering it for sale. But who sees it?"

"That's so." Willing abandoned his stand without great rejuctance, [i appeared. The conversation was changed, and the topic was not raised again until some ten or fifteen minutes later the girl suggested that Cadogan might be amused by the view from the circular balcony round the tower, at the be amused by the view from the cir-cular balcony round the tower, at the level of the service room.

"I think" began Cadogan, as Willing shut the door and nervously shot the bolt—"I think that I'll have a look at that sign board in the morning. This is curious enough to bear investigation, Ferhaps the board will give me a clue."

He grew conscious that Willing was staring at him with speculative, hard eyes, out of which every glint of humor had gone. As Cadogan met his gaze the man dropped his eyelids surlily.

"I wouldn't if I were you," he growled.
"No, I wouldn't. Best to let things like that that there's no understanding.
